

ROBERT HALL

Managing Consultant, Marsh

Robert currently works as Managing Consultant for Marsh in London, advising clients on business continuity planning and risk assessments.

He previously worked at Barclays where he was the Group Strategic Assessments Manager responsible for analysing the threats to the business worldwide from terrorism, crime, activism and natural disasters, as well as designing contingency measures that would minimise the risks. Robert dealt with the consequences of the terrorist attacks of 7 July 2005, as well as preparing plans to deal with pandemics, floods and protest.

From 2000 to 2003, Robert worked as Project Director for an international company, designing and managing all aspects of a global security forum. The activity was a continuation of work he carried out as Head of Analysis at the National Criminal Intelligence Service in London (1997-2000). Robert has written extensively on strategic intelligence and security issues and has written a book on Russian military affairs.
